Send a Houzz Gift Card. I have it and a Bosch dryer sitting next to each other in a bathroom under a counter top with a wall on one side and a vanity on the other. They fit perfectly, so I have no room for anything larger. The dryer is still working fine so I just want to replace the washer. The washer and drain connections are in the same place and I can plug the power cord into the back of my dryer, so hook up should be easy. I pulled my current washer out the extra inch and it looks odd. Are there any other 220v washers I should consider. Or should just go with the new Bosch and not care about the washer sticking out the extra inch And if your water tank isnt really close to the washer, the incoming water that fills the wash cycle will be residual cooled water thats been sitting in the pipes cooling down, and your clothes wont get very clean. So yeah, the Bosch is probably the best choice. If anyone has any other suggestions Id love to hear them. He will be disturbing and removing lead components when he is there, then disturb it more off site and then disturb ut once again when he puts them back in. It sounds like he could think that taking them off site meansbthr RRP rules do not apply. The installation of new windows would absolutely disturb the paint during removal and the capping of the exterior trim. Abstrment of lead paint on windows can be done on or off site. I find it best to do the work on the sashes off site. Work on the frames, jambs, sill and trim are typicall done on site. Encapsulation is not permitted on friction surfaces for obvious reasons, and most of the components of a window are friction surfaces. Encapsulation is permitted by licensed personal only and I dont recommend it nor would I do it, enclosure, replacement or removal are better methods IMO.

The interior side of a sash and interior trim are not as likely to contain lead based paint, the exterior side of the sash, jamb and exterior casing most always do. I would test any interior components to know for sure the others parts I would assume positive in this vintage of house..See More Help! Need new toploader oldschool washer too many choices. Often, an island that is a barrier can be replaced by a well placed peninsula but we would need a layout with measurements to see if that would work. If you have enough counter space and it looks like you may an island is not even necessary. Rarely does an island work in a U shaped kitchen unless it is quite large. Islands work well in L shaped kitchens or open plan kitchens. It was the move toward open concept that made the island popular. Others think the peninsula is old fashion and the island is the new thing but peninsulas are not old fashion often they are the best layout in a small area. I would hesitate to make expensive changes using painted over previously finished cabinets. The best Ive seen need light touch ups in 3 years and many more touch ups in 5 years. Painting is a good way to give worn cabinets a few more years of life while planning for a new kitchen. On the positive side, your cabinets are maple and that paints up better much better than oak. I did add some new cabinetry bought unfinished and stained to match my present cabinets as has been mentioned, that is easier if you paint.

Also, my wood is oak which has a lot of natural variation and that helps camouflage slight stain variations. My cabinets are 22 years old and they are US made from a home center store. It might be worth looking into how much new cabinets would be. The one appliance change I would make would be to get a dedicated vent hood and put the microwave elsewhere. Some kitchens work better with a peninsula and some with an island. That depends on the space you have which we cannot really tell without a measured drawing of the space. I have an L shaped kitchen with a smallish island. It works for me, but could be tight for multiple cooks. This is my wood kitchens idea book which has both new and older, refreshed kitchens. You might see something that appeals to you. My only concern with maple cabinets is that natural maple tends to yellow over time. Your other trim looks white go ahead and paint the window trim too.
